Prerequisites:
Course requirements:
Learning outcomes: This course provides an overview of major events, developments, and tendencies in modern Chinese literature, including concurrent debates in literary criticism and research, and finally their reflection in the history of literary writing. Particular emphasis is given to the issue of "modernity" in China, which has become a hot topic of discussion over the past decades, especially since the "new period" (xin shiqi, after 1979). The outcome of these controversies could lead to a conclusion that modern literature was established when there was a combination of the convergence of written language with spoken language and material modernization (i.e., Liang Qichao, Huang Zunxian, and others after 1898), and at the same time, also a connection with the industrial technique of reproduction. This process will be presented with examples from literary texts up to the 21st century, based on bilingual Chinese-English or Chinese-Slovak or Chinese-Czech texts.
Class syllabus: 1. Introduction: what is modern? What is modern literature? What is modern Chinese literature? 2. Reform in language and thought. Poetry written in baihua. Xu Zhimo and others. 3. The formalist school in poetry, the pioneers. Wen Yiduo, Bing Xin, Zhu Ziqing 4. Poetry, the Symbolists and others. Xu Yunuo, Zhu Xiang, Feng Zhi, Li Jinfa, Lin Huiyin, Dai Wangshu 5. Engaged or disengaged poetry? Art for art's sake or art with a political accent? Guo Moruo, Ai Qing, Bian Zhilin, He Qifang. 6. Prose writing. Lu Xun and the "New China" 7. The beginnings of realism in 20th century Chinese literature. Lao She, Ba Jin. 8. Realism, decadence, revolutionary lit. 1920s. Mao Dun, Yu Dafu, Teng Gu, Xu Dishan and others 9. Far from the noisy crowd. Prose by Shen Congwen and Lin Yutang 10. Ding Ling and other women in modern Chinese literature 11. Short story writers, satirists, people wielding the pen in the first half of the 20th century. 12. Literature for the masses. Mao Zedong's Conversations on Literature and Art at the Yan'an Conference and their Impact on Literature 13. Final discussion
